

Good Interface Design

Google Search is a widely used web search engine that allows users to find relevant information from across the internet by typing in keywords or queries. I believe that its current interface is a great example of good design. Its simplistic and very intuitive design allows users to focus on its most important functionality with no distractions.

Bad Interface Design

Craigslist is an online classifieds platform where users can post and browse listings for jobs, housing, services, and goods in various categories, often with a focus on local transactions. I think its interface is an example of bad design, it's very dense with text, it's not very well-structured causing users to have difficulty finding the desired categories. Its design has not changed much since its creation and so it has kept the habit of having very styling. I think it would benefit with the use of symbols/images of the main categories, with some drop-down list to expose more options.
